

Current FCC members should think long and hard about how they're systematically allowing large corporate interests to control the public airwaves. You cannot continue to act as if any action that is good for a particular business or industry is also good for the public interest. This is a clear example of how principles of the public good are being violated, on your watch. Ask yourselves this: what if this large media company decided, instead, to force all of its stations to air a program in support of Al Qaeda? would you then suddenly realize that the public good is not being served?

The FCC must act immediately on the complaint filed by the DNC, to prevent Sinclair from making this blatant in-kind contribution to the Bush campaign.
